Introduction

How to score an internship during the COVID-19 pandemic

Even though unemployment has reached a record high due to business closures & social distancing measures, you can still snag an internship if you know how to adapt & get creative. Below are the tips that can help you-internships: During this pandemic a large percentage of employer have moved to virtual internship program which has opened up opportunities for you to work from home. Look for employers who are hiring virtual interns and start applying to those internships.

1.Go for work from home

2. Broaden your prospects: As you start to make any type of career plan, it is helpful to be focused yet flexible. The pandemic demonstrates how quickly even the best plans can change. Expand your thinking and the types of roles or industries you are applying to.

3. Build career-ready skills:

Ultimately, employers will value what skills you can bring to them. So if you are having difficulty finding a formal internship or a part-time job – whether this summer or anytime – use the time to identify and build new skills. The top skills employers seek on resumes, such as verbal and written communication and problem-solving, are skills you can build at home right now.

Acing the interview round

Telephonic Interview

- Make sure that you do thorough research about the company. Be clear about your role and then go for the interview.
- Have a look at this video to get ready for the telephonic interview - <http://bit.ly/is-telephonic-interview>

Interview Etiquette

- Engage - Don't just give 'Yes/No' answers to leading questions. For example when asked 'Can you write well?' - don't just say 'Yes'. Talk about various kinds of topics that you have written on.
- Listen - Let the interviewer complete his/her sentence or question. Don't cut in.
- Understand and think - before you speak. It is OK to take time before you answer. Just say 'May I take a moment before I answer this?' whenever you want to pause a little before answering.

- Ask - whenever a question is not clear to you or if you could not hear it properly the first time.
- Be honest - If you don't know the answer to a question, say so ('I am sorry, I do not know the answer to that.').
- Don't whine or complain - about a professor, or a team member, or your previous work experience/internship.
- Show interest - when given an opportunity, ask questions to the interviewer about the company or the role.
- After the interview gets over, if you get an opportunity, write a thank you email and ask for feedback (sample email below).

Dear sir,

I would like to thank you for giving me an opportunity to interview with your company. It was a great experience for me.

Please do let me know if you have some feedback on my performance during the interview and what I could have done better.

Thank you once again and I look forward to hearing from you.

Warm regards,

Preparing for the HR questions

We have compiled the top 5 most common questions that you may face in an HR round with sample answers.

1. Tell me about yourself.

Understand why this question is asked - Meant to be an ice-breaker for you and the interviewer to settle in and get comfortable with each other. It also allows the interviewer to judge how nervous you are and a confident answer can be a great start and half the battle won.

How to answer - Start off with a brief intro, quickly move over to your career interests (and why), and a bit of info on your hobbies and interests.

2. Why do you want to join our organization and not this other company (say X)?

Understand why this question is asked - To understand how much research about the company you have done before the interview and if there is a genuine fit between what organization does and offers to its employees and what you want.

How to answer - Be specific. Mention things that you know about the organization which you find exciting. There could be different things about an organization (size, customer loyalty, it being innovation-friendly, work culture, team, maybe it offers support for higher studies, etc.) that one may find interesting and offer that as a reason.

3. What are your strengths?

Understand why this question is asked - To know you better, to understand if you are self-aware of what you are good at. Also to assess your fit with the role.

How to answer - During your introspection before the interview, you may have identified a few things that you are good at (say programming or leading teams) or a few positive behaviour traits (good attention to details), etc. You can mention all of them or pick 2-3 that are most relevant to the organization. Always support your claims with real examples from your life.

4. What are your weaknesses?

Understand why this question is asked - We don't think this question can/should ever be asked to assess whether you are a good fit for the role because no candidate in his/her right mind would tell an interviewer about a weakness that will jeopardise his/her chances of getting the internship (such as 'I often beat people up in my fit of rage'). However, this question can be used to assess how self-aware you are about yourself.

How to answer - Pick a relatively safe weakness that would not hamper your chances of getting the internship. Also, offer what you are doing to correct that weakness now that you have realized that you have a weakness.

5. What are your expectations from this internship?

Understand why this question is asked - To assess whether there is a good match between the role and your expectations. Also to assess whether you have understood the role in detail or not. Because if there is a gap between the profile and your expectations, it is unlikely that you would stay for long.

How to answer - There must be some reason why you have applied for that particular role and you must have some expectations in return - state those. Ask yourself, what do you hope to learn or get out of that role?

Getting an internship is not as hard as you might think. In our recent campaign 'Dil Ki Suno, Internship Karo', there are 5,000+ work from home internships.

Simply choose what kind of internships you want to go for and with the steps we have discussed above, you can easily find your dream internship!

So, go ahead and make your best application :)
